Abigaïl AUPERIN

French artist

Born in 1991, lives and works in Paris.

Abigaïl Auperin literally creates films for herself. Her inner cinema reaches us through suspended images, as if taken just before or just after the action. For each photograph, she devotes meticulous time to writing storyboards, scouting locations, choosing costumes, makeup, and accessories, directing the models, their expressions, the positioning of their bodies and hands, and, of course, creating the lighting. The photo shoots themselves are quick. They capture the mental image.

The reality she brings into being is both entirely true and entirely artificial—made of 99% polyester and 1% ideal, to borrow two of her titles. In this reality, the flow of time is abolished, no body can die, everything is neutralized forever. His borrowings from advertising aesthetics, from camp, from firebrand painting, from genre cinema, from the 80s, from everything that Western culture has produced that is most artificial, serve only this purpose: to preserve reality from decay; to preserve us from cruelty.

To plunge into the false until it becomes true that's what children do when they play. They project themselves headlong into worlds of infinite possibilities by manipulating figurines. They mold them according to their anxieties and desires. They remain impassive.
